

How To Buy Bitcoins With Your Credit Card

This page aims to be the best resource for new users to understand how to buy Bitcoins using credit cards. Be extremely careful when buying bitcoins from not accredited websites or individuals. Like in the real world there are many scammers around. If you feel like you are on a site that could be a scam, ask around on online forums that are bitcoin oriented to see if others have used that source before.

Warning: Please be careful with your money. When sending money to an exchange or seller you are trusting that the operator will not abscond with your funds and that the operator maintains secure systems that protect against theft -- internal or external. It is recommended that you obtain the real-world identity of the operator and ensure that sufficient recourse is available. Because Bitcoin services are not highly regulated a service can continue operating even when it is widely believed that it is insecure or dishonest and webpages recommending them (including these) may not be regularly updated. Exchanging or storing significant amounts of funds with third-parties is not recommended.

Intro

While in the recent past it has been risky for sellers to offer this option, some services are now allowing you to buy bitcoins with your credit card. However, that does not mean it is entirely risk free in all markets; if you are from Asia or Africa your funds may be frozen by credit card payment processors for further inspection due to the large amounts of fraud that come from those continents.

Note: If you only want to take advantage of Bitcoin's price volatility you can trade CFDs on Bitcoin via a credit card on sites like AvaTrade or Plus500. When trading online your capital may be at risk. Trading CFDs is suitable for more experienced traders.
